Essay Outline

Outlining Essays Written by Using an Outline

Using an outline can greatly simplify your essay writing process. In fact, I don't recommend writing an essay without an outline! Without properly structuring your essay before writing, you're at risk for a essay that isn't up to its fullest potential.

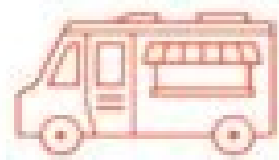

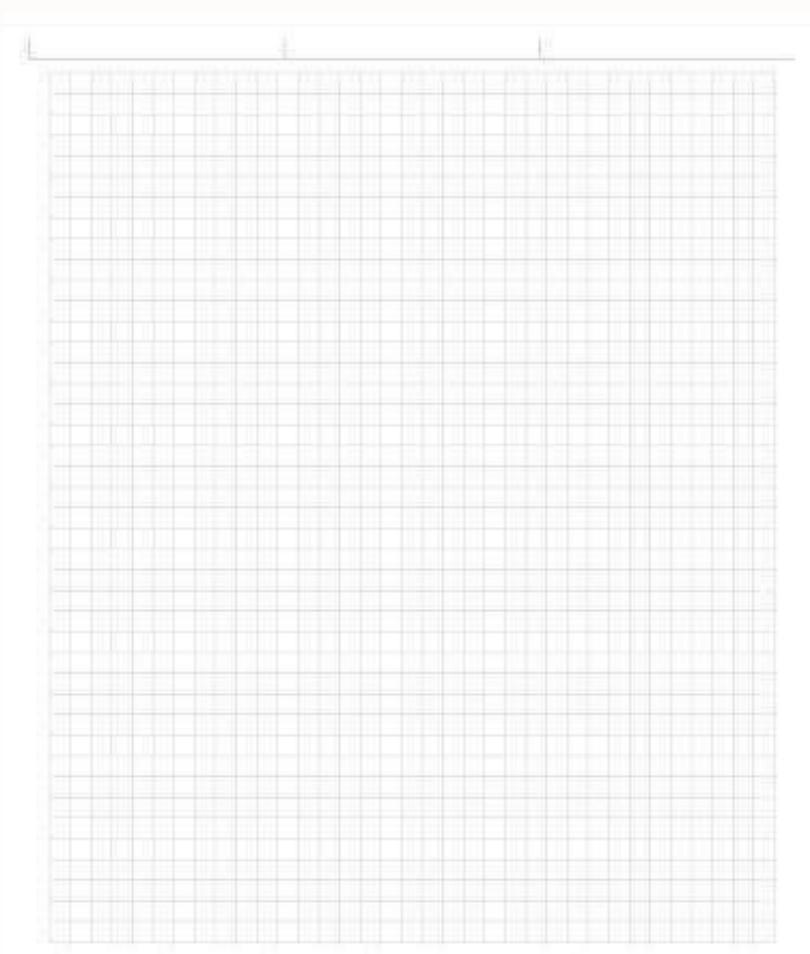

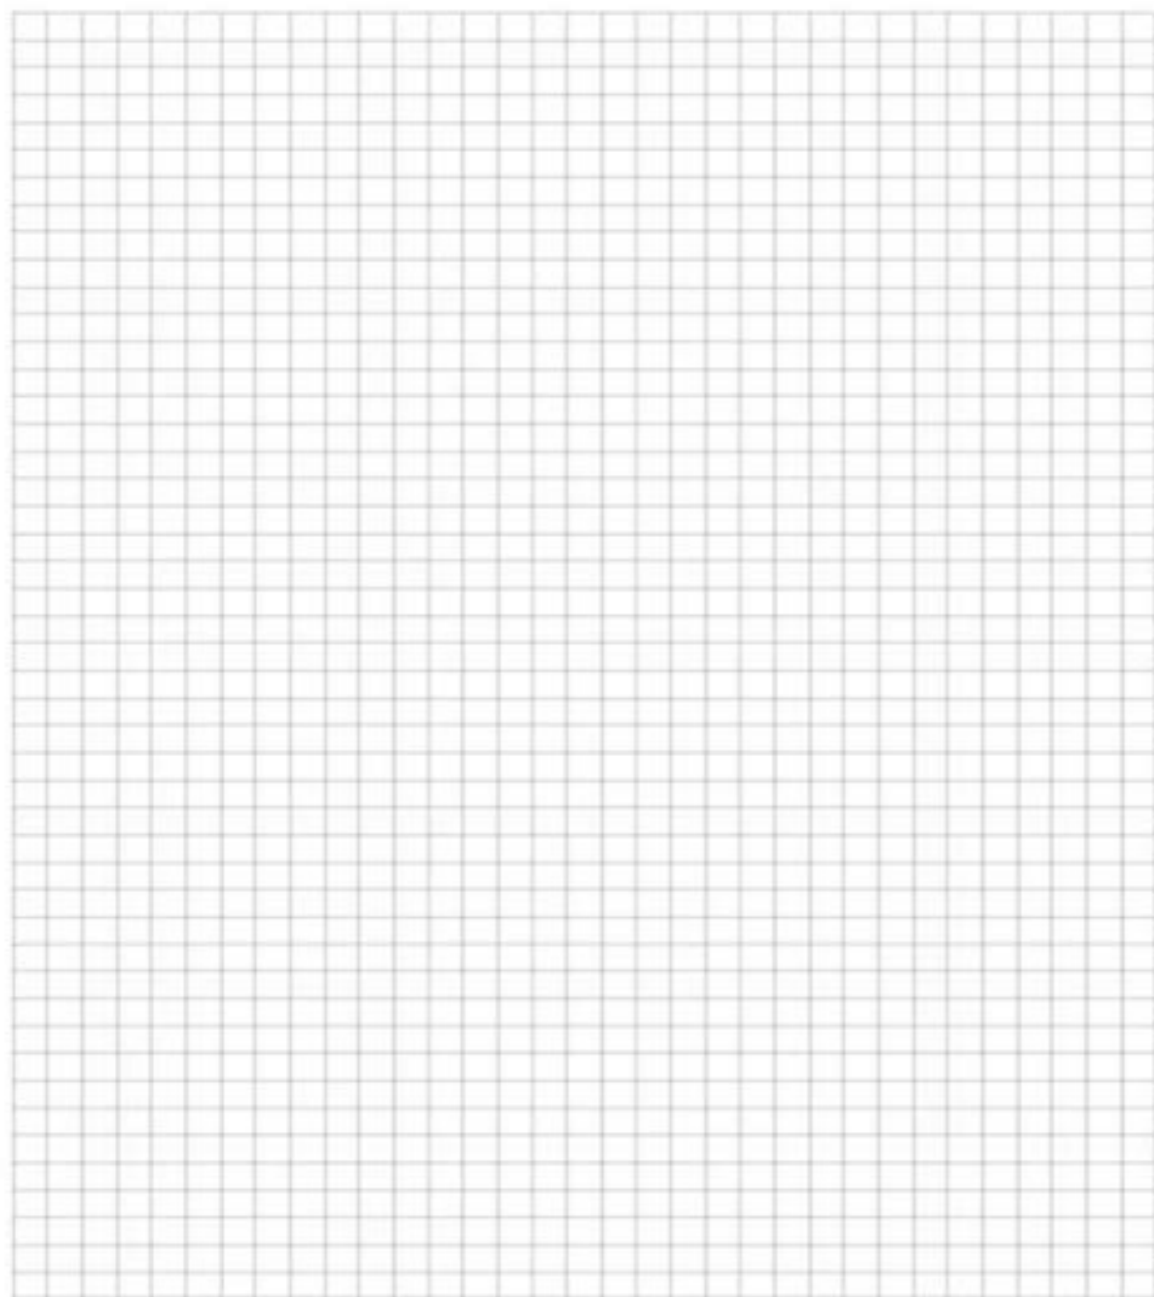

Creating a essay outline can have many benefits. First of all, it helps you -as the writer- concentrate on your writing process. Secondly, it gives a significant amount of organization and structure to your written AND presented essay. Lastly, it allows you to break your writing process into chunks so you'll never forget to include all the critical points.

The first step is to decide the topic of your essay. How well do you know the deceased person? Were you a close friend or a distant relative? What exact message do you want to write? Do you want to include any personalization or metaphor?

Once decided, you can then move onward into details. Think of every detail related to the time you've decided on. One of the best ways to think of details is to list the person's name on a piece of paper. What all do you think of when you think of them? How did they contribute to the world? How did they have cross with you?

Lastly, now that you have your main points down, go back and elaborate on them. Do you have any unique stories to tell? How did it affect you? How can you make the story concrete as it affects the audience and helps them recollect the deceased? Remember to break each point down further into specific supports of details, entertaining information.

People love concrete stories and specific examples. Strive to include unique things that the audience can recollect and/or remember the person by. Speak from your heart... you'll own the audience.

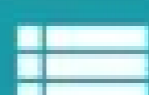

Put together your demographic and laddering information. With both you may target your consumer in a more direct and correct way. The Laddering approach focuses more on the "what" and "why," and that is the information you can use to match your brand attributes with the desires of your potential customer. With both the demographic information and the laddering data, you can figure out why somebody may buy your product. You can alter your brand so it accommodates the desires of your potential customer, and ask yourself again why the potential customer would buy your product.

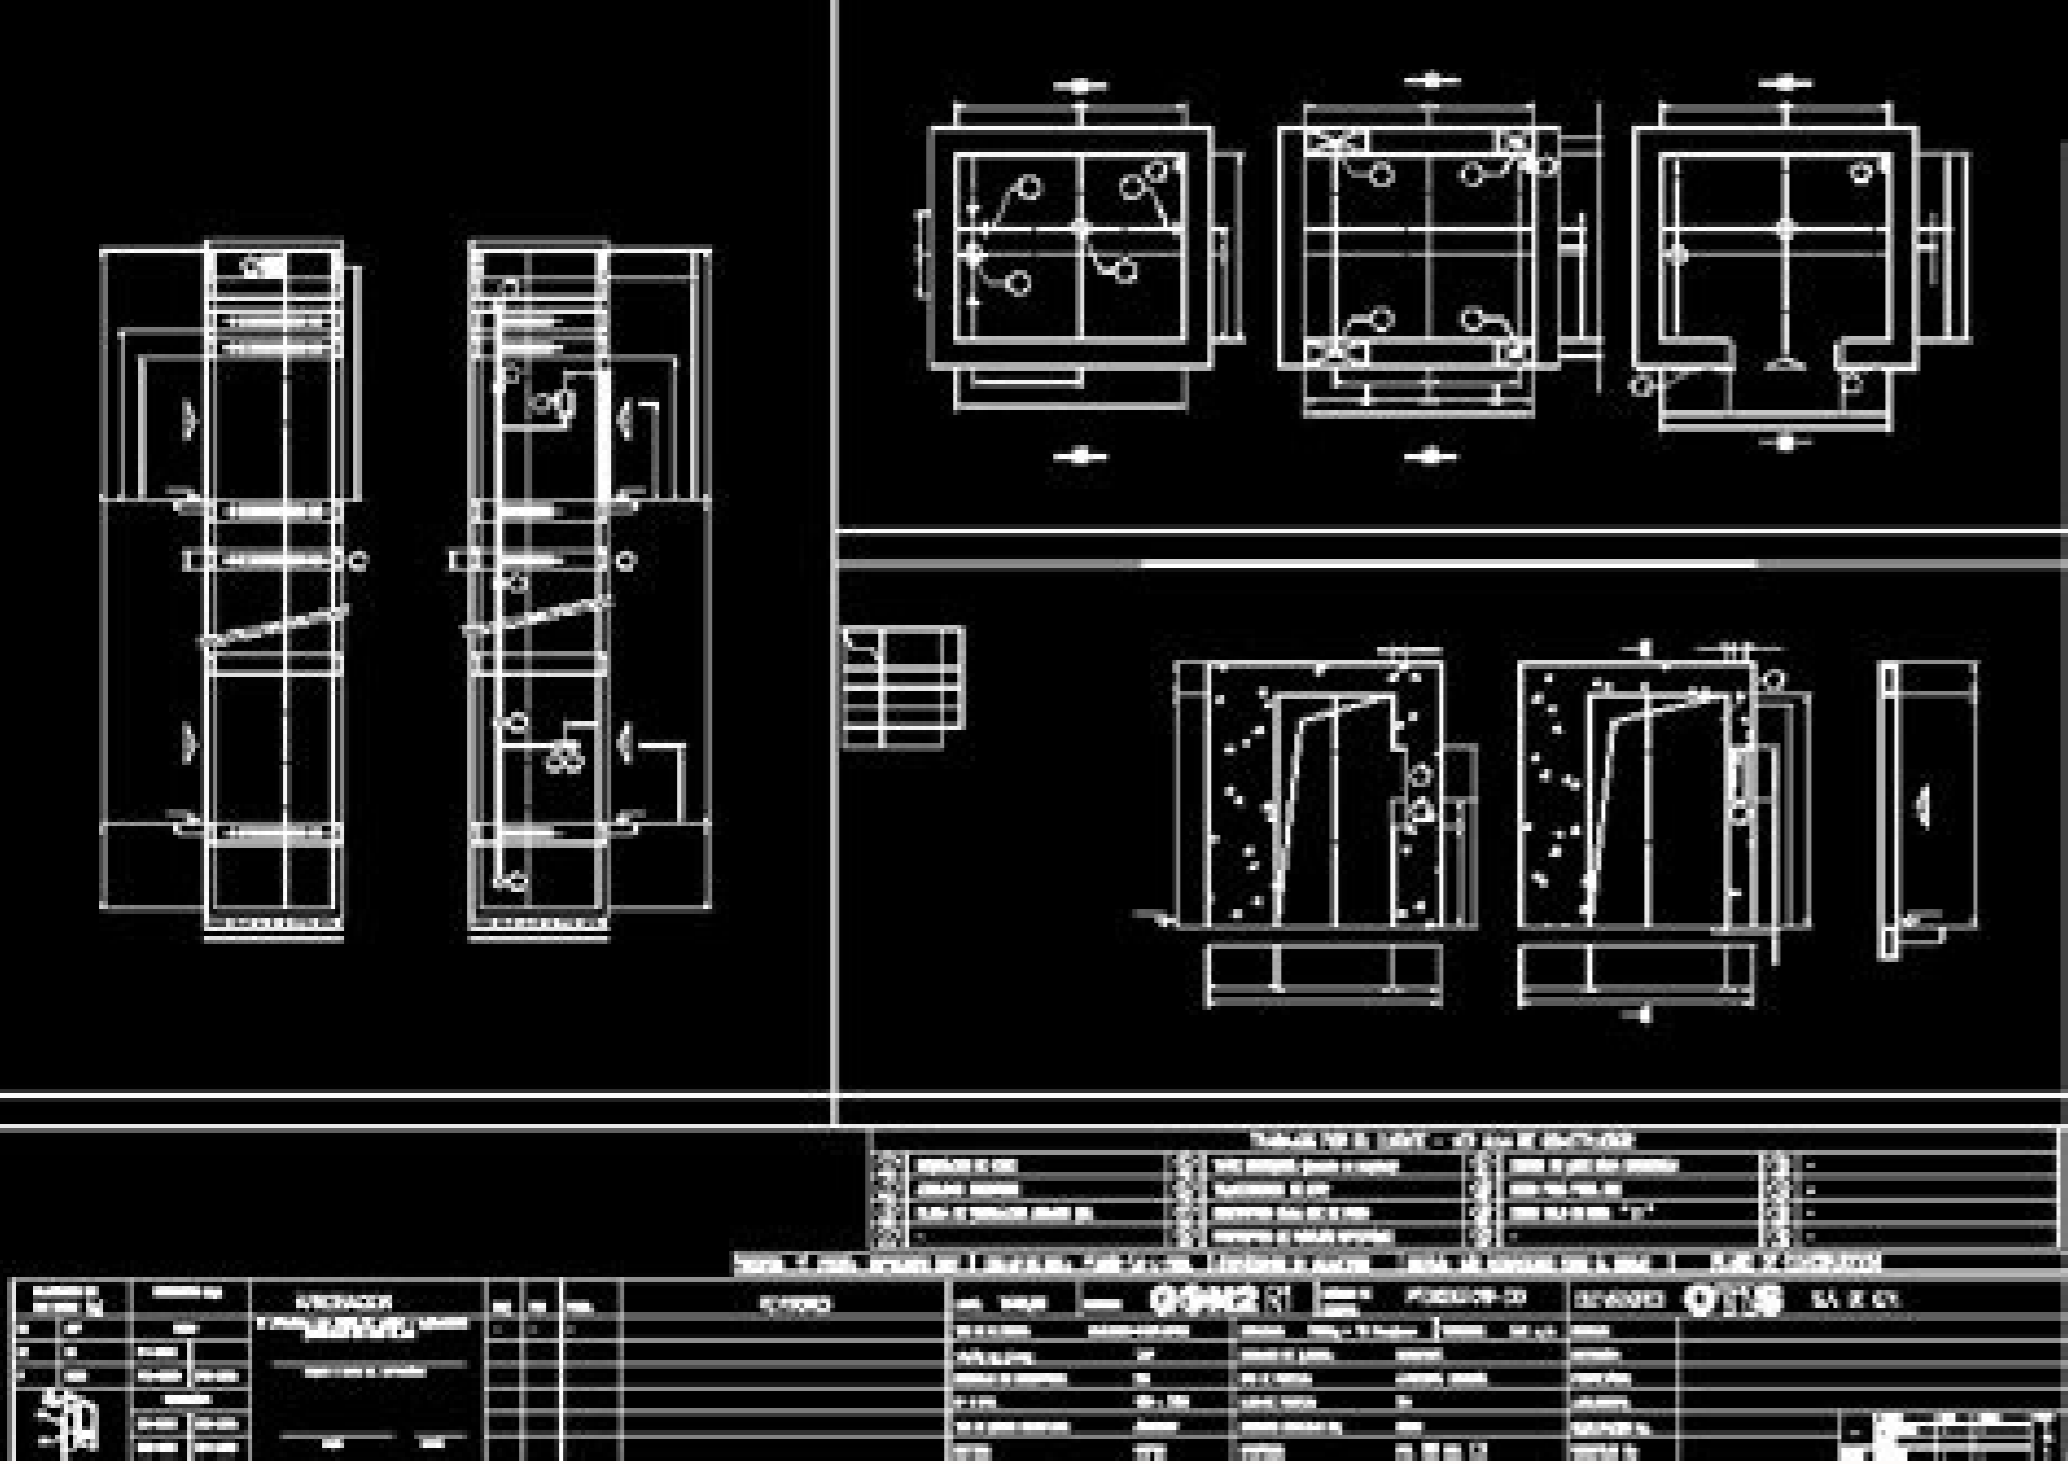

Why wouldn't the potential customer buy your product? It would be silly and biased if you only looked at the reasons "why" a potential customer buys from you. If your brand attributes are aimed at serving and appealing to the desires of your target audience and potential customer, then surely you should have 100% strike rate. It means that any consumer that is ready to buy should buy from your brand as soon as he or she is exposed to it and this should happen 100% of the time without any exposed consumer ever going to your competitors. Yet, this is not a likely circumstance you find yourself in, which is why you have to ask why your potential customers "do not" buy from you.

You need to focus on the potential customers that are ready to buy. You need to understand why that person doesn't buy from you "if" you are successfully targeting and successfully matching your brand attributes to his or her desires. Is there something you are missing? Is there and part of your brand that doesn't appeal to that person's desires? You cannot expect a 100% strike rate, but if your competitors have a better strike rate than you then it may spell disaster over the long term. These are the reasons you need to explore why ready-to-buy potential customers do not buy from you. It could be a multitude of reasons from the quality of the food, the price of the food all the way to the ingredients of the food. The more research you do the better prepared you will be.

In this case, you should only concentrate on the ready-to-buy potential customer because you
